Read the carefully then do the activities

Natural disasters have always elicited solidarity. Firstly ,people help each other to cope with emergency needs .Then religion makes it a moral imperative .Religious orders have often organized aid for the victims before states and private organizations such as the Red Cross or NGOs intervene

I particularly remember the recent flood in the south of France. Although it left very few human victims, it is still considered as probably the most catastrophic one this area has ever known.

The images we saw on TV were most of the time very sad. Swollen rivers covered huge urban and rural areas. Crops hid underwater and animals died in their sheds. People had just enough time to climb up the roofs of their houses, or to go upstairs to escape from the water which was rising at an unbelievablespeed. Rescue brigades used life boats to take people to safe places since in most areas wheeled vehicles couldn't be used.

Now rain has stopped, water level is decreasing and people discover what has become of theirproperties: tons of mud to extract from restaurants, shops, offices, gardens, rooms and kitchens. French southern populations will never forget how strong naturecould be on October 1993.
